

DIFFERENT WAYS OF EXPRESSION BETWEEN ENGLISH AND CHINESE

Recently, I have been fascinated with English novels. Actually, I spent a lot of time reading famous literary works when I was a college student. At that time, reading was a way to spend spare time. Immersed in the world of heroes or heroines, I always forgot my own world. I have to admit it is a really wonderful feeling, for I can experience all kinds of life, peaceful or exciting. It's really amazing.

However, five years later after graduation, I find a different state of mind in reading. No longer obsessed with interesting plots, I turned to appreciate the words, phrases or sentences that are elaborately chose by authors. It's equally marvelous.

Such a change may be the result of my commitment to an excellent English translator. To become a qualified translator, I should, in the first place, have a thorough understanding about the native and target languages, and the most effective way is to read extensively.

The novel I am so crazy about is Gone with the Wind by Margaret Mitchell. Besides the romantic story between Scarlet and Rhett, I am also deeply impressed by the difference ways of expression between Chinese and English.

As we know, Chinese and English belong to two completely different language families. English is an Indo-European language, but Chinese a

Our Services

Document
Translation Services

Interpretation
Services

Desktop
Publishing Services

Video
Translation Solutions

